IN preparing the following Catalogue, the object of the society was to furnish, together with a full and complete list of its present, past and honorary members, a ready means of reference to the books of its library.

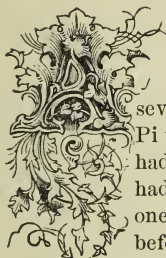

The committee have spared neither time nor labor to render it as complete as possible in both these respects. Nevertheless, we fear that there yet remain some few inaccuracies, both in the residences of past members and in the classification of some books of a mixed character.

HISTORICAL SKETCH.

T one of the late annual re-unions of the Sigma Pi Society, President STURTEVANT said, in response to a toast, that of several attempted literary societies in Illinois College, the Sigma Pi was the first that succeeded in maintaining an existence. He had watched with interest the various attempts, some of which had seemed quite promising, but all had ended in failure till this one came up. It had been in existence some time, he remembered, before he heard of it; and then it moved on so quietly for a long time that he heard but little of it, and knew not whether it would live or die. But its course was different from that of others, he knew not how; and at last, not only was its own continuance secure, but, as is usual in all Colleges, it brought into existence a younger and rival association. From that time he had no longer doubted the permanence of the literary societies of Illinois College.

An early member of the society, then present, in response to a subsequent toast, gave some facts in its early history, and told why it had succeeded when others failed; what element of power it had which they had lacked. The following sketch of its origin will show the same:

In 1840, there entered College, at the same time, but in different classes, SAMUEL WILLARD and HENRY WING. Although strangers, they became room mates and friends, and remained intimate associates afterward, when rooming with members of their respective classes. Some new currents of thought prevailing at that time in the Institution, the rooms of these two became the centers of the spontaneous conversational gatherings of members of the classes of '42, '43, '44, 45 and 46, wherein topics of literature, philosophy, theology and other grave matters of which students delight to talk, were discussed. These gatherings were very pleasant to all who had a share in them. Perhaps they interfered sometimes with the Greek and Mathematics of the earlier years of the course, but in turn they gave a greater value to the more reflective studies of the later years, and assured for them a closer attention and a better comprehension.

There was at that time no students' society in College but the Debating or Philologian Society, which was open to all. The two above named, in common with several others, desired the formation of a literary society with other aims than the mere discussion of debatable subjects. Of the possibility of organizing and maintaining such a society they felt assured by the interest of the frequent gatherings of "friends in council" in their rooms; and in the winter of 1842-'43 they determined to begin their effort. Before communicating their plans to any, they ascertained in conversation that they could secure prompt seconding from a sufficient number; they then drew up a constitution. The first person to whom they presented their plans was WILLIAM HENRY MILBURN, since known as "the blind preacher," who was then a student in College and a frequent member of the conversational circles. They saw that UNITY was the first requisite for success—not unity of opinion, but unity of interest. All previous societies had been formed in mass meetings of students; and whoso chose entered the organization, which soon fell to pieces from the magnitude, diversity and indifference of its membership; hence these two determined to adopt the opposite plan, begin with a few, and increase the numbers.

When they were ready, WILLARD notified those who were accustomed to gather in their conversational circles, and a few others, to meet one Saturday afternoon in WING's room; and to that meeting of ten or twelve they opened their plans and views, and offered their constitution as a basis of action, for discussion, amendment, reference, or adoption, as might seem best. The "few others" spoken of above were invited in because of their expressed interest in the promotion of such a society, toward which some of them had already moved, and it was desired to bring their strength into the movement, while it was hoped that they would readily coalesce with those now acting. The proposed constitution contained a provision for the election of new members by ballot, a majority of two-thirds being required for an election. This the majority were well pleased with; but two or three of the "few others" opposed it strenuously as aristocratic, ungenerous and odious, and demanded that the society be formed with open doors in mass meeting. The constitution was referred to a committee, another meeting was appointed, and the Secretary directed to invite in certain others named. Before the next meeting the matter was bruited about and represented to many in quite an unfavorable light, and the meeting proved a discordant one. The friends of the close ballot prevailed, but on account of the opposition determined to postpone the organization, and let the others try their plan, if they would. They did nothing; and near the close of the term, just before the graduation of the class of 1843, the friends of the movement took up the paper originally presented by WILLARD and WING, adopted it as their constitution, and thus organized the Sigma Pi Society. None of the class of 1843 were included in the society, as they were about to leave, and thus T. K. BEECHER, BATEMAN and WILLARD, although in the original movement, were not at first members. The existence of the society was at first kept secret. Next term BEECHER, BATEMAN and others were elected honorary members, WILLARD, remaining at College as tutor, became an acting member; and of the students, such were elected as would bring strength to the society. Increase of numbers was not regarded so much as devotion to the literary and philosophic purposes of the organization. When its existence was no longer held secret, the society was too strong to be attacked, and membership was too much of an honor to be declined.

For some months no name was selected for the society. While this matter was under consideration, LEWIS said in conversation with WILLARD that the objects of the society, which its name should suggest to its members, were to his mind these two: Union and progress. WILLARD selected two corresponding Greek words, Συστάσις και Προκοπή, and presenting them with LEWIS' suggestion at the next meeting proposed that their initials be taken for the name of the society; the suggestion pleased all, and the name was adopted. About the same time WING proposed that the society adopt as its motto the Hebrew sentence, from the history of the creation, in Genesis, "לְהִאֲרֹאֹר" — "Let there be light,"—and this also was adopted.

Thus was born and named the Sigma Pi Society of Illinois College, to enter upon its career of PROGRESS in UNION and for the spread of LIGHT. Its latter history is spread upon its records, and dwells in the memories of the successive bearers of its standard and of its worthy name.

Since the old Catalogue was issued the society has increased greatly in numbers; many valuable works have been added to the library; the hall has been well refurnished, and an elegant portrait of President STURTEVANT, by HEALY, of Chicago, placed over the rostrum. The "Roll of Honor" speaks for itself.

Proud of its past, most prosperous in the present, the old Sigma Pi looks hopefully forward to its future.
